

there Saturday night. I asked them who was getting married and they said, "Oh, just one of the girls upstairs". One of the men mentioned the fact that the place was a disorderly house and I then asked him if Mrs. Williams rented rooms. He said she has roomers up there but you could not get a room up there, she caters to a certain trade. This man told me that all the boys around the neighborhood were invited to the wedding. I then asked these fellows in the saloon for a drink and they accepted my invitation and we had several drinks at the bar and while we were talking a short intoxicated man came in the barroom. One of my informants informed me that this man lives upstairs. He produced an empty pint whiskey flask and handed it to the bartender. The bartender filled it and gave it to this man and the man returned upstairs. This man was a hard looking character, and one of my informants knew him.

I then inquired of one of my informants how Mrs. Williams felt toward her sister Mrs. Gibson in regard to this murder situation at New Brunswick. He then told me that Mrs. Williams had no use for her sister and wants nothing to do with her. In fact, they are not on good terms.

The saloon keeper, who is the owner of this building, refers to the woman upstairs as the "pig woman" also. She is commonly known as the "pig woman" around this neighborhood and is known to be a wild character.
